AN AWKWARD PREDICAMENT.

Philadelphia Times If I had never met Helen Barclay the promise I gave my father while he lay upon his death-bed would probably have been followed by no unpleasant consequences. It has been said that a man can fall in love as often as he can eat. This may be true if he never happens to fall in love as I did with Miss Barclay. Such a love can be born in a man but once.

She was beautiful. My tastes were generally very different from Dick Merritt's, but he agreed with me, as did everybody else, that Helen Barclay was magnificent. She was a little taller than most girls of 20 are, but so well proportioned that she semed to be not above the medium height. Her features were not purely classical, but what they lacked in regularity was more than compensated by the sweetness and in-telligence of her expression. Her eyes were a dozen different colors. The first time they beamed upon me they were a heavenly At other times they have seemed dark and flashing. But Miss Barclay was rich (or her father was, which amounted to the same thing, for the was his only child), while I was at that time a poor attorney, with no practice to speak of and no very brilliant prospects for ever being able to build up one.

This what made my position so awkward Just before my father closed his eyes upon sarthly scenes he called me to his bedside

"Robert, I am about to leave you penniless and alone in the world. I want you to make me a promise. When your mother and I were married she was wealthy and I Had it not been so I think was poor. would have lived happily together. As it was, we were miserable. Through an un-lucky speculation I lost her money, and after that I never knew a moment's true happiness. I do not blame her for what I have had to endure. It was my own fault I should not have married above my station in life. It is to satisfy myself that you will not repeat my mistake that I wish you to promise me never to ask a girl who richer than yourself to be your wife." I promised, and a few hours later he passed to his eternal rest.

Merritt always frankly maintained that I was a fool for paying any attention to what he was pleased to term "the whimsical exaction of a man who could not, under the circumstances, have been in his right senses," and as I look back upon it all now senses, and as I look back upon it all how it I am inclined to believe that he was right.

"It's all a piece of folly," he was wont to say. "Of course you have the God-given right to do as you like about such things. but I assure you that all the death-bed prom-ises that I could make in a month wouldn't have the slightest effect upon me if I ever got a chance to marry a girl with a fortune."
That was all well enough for him, but I happened to be differently constituted. felt myself as firmly bound by the promise I had made as if it had been an oath registered in the judgment book of heaven. How be it if, as I have said, I had never known Helen Barclay the unhappiness born of my father's request would probably never have come to me. Again, if I had been of a more temperate disposition, I might have seen, before it was too late. that there was between us a social gulf that it would be next to madness for me to presume to leap. Even if it had not been for my promise (which I have kept to the letter) there were reasons enough to have discouraged a bolder man than I at the start. Among the lady's acquaintances were dozens of rich young men, any of whom would have been glad to offer himself to her, and any one of whom, it might have been supposed, she would have preferred to me. But, as our friend Bottom says, "Reason and love keep little company nowadays." I loved Helen Barclay the first time I ever saw her. We became friends and I had cause for believing that my love was not unrequited. For a time I gave myself up to the de lightful business of "basking in the sun-light of her smiles," but at length the promise to my father began to bear down upon me. Day by day it grew more burden-some, until I finally determined to take Dick Merritt's advice, throw my scruples to the winds and ask Helen to be my wife. I was sitting alone in my room when I came to this conclusion. Outside the wind was moaning drearly and the rain was beating fiercely against the panes. It was me of the one on which my father died.

For hours after going to bed I tossed restlessly about, unable to sleep. At last I fell into a fitful doze, from which I awoke in a cold perspiration. In a dream I had en my father standing at the side of the bed. There was in his eyes a look of deep reproach. After gazing at me for a short me he said in ghostly tones: "Robert, you are about to do that which will render you miserable all the rest of your life."

I could not answer, and, with a wave his hand, he summoned Helen to his side. "Do you know that in asking her to be your wife you will be violating the sacred promise you made me when I lay upon my death-bed?" Still I was unable to reply, and Helen stretched out her hands toward me. There was a look of earnest supplication in her eyes that made me determine to forsake all for her. Z

My father seemed to read my thoughts and pointing toward heaven he said: "Eternal unhappiness be upon you both!"
With that he vanished, and as his voice died away my beautiful Helen became trans-formed into a hideous hag, who tried to put her arms around my neck. I cried out and I have never had a dream that affecte me as this one did. It was so real that, at first, I half expected to hear that Miss Barclay had actually become the repulsive creature my vision had pictured her. The knew that I could not disregard the promise I had made to my father, however trivial it might seem to others, and hope to ever enjoy a moment's true happiness after-ward. I ceased paying attentions to her, knowing that it would be best for both of us if we could forget each other. Shortly after this Merritt, who I had always supposed intended to marry Miss Staunton, seemed to become possessed of a sudden fancy for Helen. As I have said. he always agreed with me that she was beautiful, but until now he had never dared more than to admire her from a distance. more than to admire her from a distance. After learning that I had determined not to see her any more, he talked of her almost constantly when he and I were alone together, extolling her beauty, her high attainments and her sweet disposition; nor did he ever neglect to remind me of the wealth she was to inherit. At first I strove to hide my feelings and drown all recollection of the girl who, but for my unfortunate position, could have made me the happiest man in the world, but Merritt seemed to take a fiendish delight in my eemed to take a fiendish delight in my vretchedness, and at length began to hint at progress in the winning of Miss Bar-clay's affections for himself.

One day, as I sat in my office, creaming of what might have been, Merritt, who had been engaged in the examination of a packet of papers, suddenly looked up and said: "Oh, I'd almost forgotten, I've made an engagement for you. Laura Staunton had everything fixed for me to act as "first walking gentleman" at a party she is to give tomorrow evening, but I had previously made on engagement with Helen; so I taid Laura that you would, no doubt, be willing to take my place." "Thanks.

"Oh," he returned, still busily sorting his papers, "that's all over with now. I've never denied, even to Laura, that it was my intention to marry wealth if I ever got the chance. Now that I have a chance I hope you don't think I'm fool enough to let it

"One would think, from the way you talk," I replied, losing my temper and longing to knock him down, "that you would simply have to say the word in order to have Miss Barclay throw herself at your feet. I can assure you that your time is being

"Why,"he returned, "you don't happen to have a proprietary interest in her, do you?"
"I have interest enough in her," I hotly responded. "to see that no fortune hunter shall ever impose on her if I can help it." "Oh, come now, old man." he answered in tones that exasperated me almost beyond the power of self-control, "don't allow your temper to run away with you. Go to Laura. She's a lovable girl, and who knows you darling and and she might, in consoling each other, find last it came that matters were not so bad after all. As I have said, she isn't an heiress, so your promise can't stand in the way there." I dared not trust myself to remain with him any longer. Another word would have impelled me to lay violent hands upon him. As I left the office I vowed to myself that Dick Merritt should never marry Helen Barclay if I could help it. Still his attentions to Miss Barclay in creased, and at length it came to be gen-erally supposed that they were engaged. I tried not to believe it, and for a time I was fool enough to picture her in my mind's eye as pining away for love of me. But at last I was forced to conclude that she did not care for me after all. She ceased smiling upon me when we met, and her bow be came something I ss than friendly. I wa he most miserable man alive. I could en dure separation from her as long as I thought that my absence made her unhappy, out the idea that she was not suffering with me was more than I could bear tranquilly, and I determined to go away; to try, amid

To think that he was gloating my misery threw me into a passion could not refrain from telling him that he night spare himself the trouble of trying to exhibit any mock sorrow over our parting "You know," I concluded, "that you're glad I'm going."

"Glad?" he returned, affecting to be sur-prised, "why should I be glad?"
"Because." I replied, half forgetting in the heat of my passion, what I was saying, "because you're afraid that despite the promise by which I am bound, I might thwart some of your plans if I remained!"

At this he burst into a roar of laughter, "Why you don't imagine," he said, "that Miss Barclay ever really cared a snap of her finger for you? Oh, no, that's too good! But never mind, you're not well. You need change of climate. I'll not bother you by saying more than that when you return I hope I shall be enjoying some of Papa Barclay's loose cash. Helen is charming and all that, but I could never think of mar-rying her for love alone; I'm too poor to do anything so sentimental. But come, let us

As he spoke he extended his hand. "Have you asked Miss Barclay to be your wife?" I demanded, for I was determined to be satisfied upon this point at least, before I was least, before I went away. "Well," he returned, "I don't know as I'm compelled, either by the laws of friendship or etiquette, to say whether I have or not. However, I don't mind telling you that my fortune has been placed at her disposal."

"And her answer?" I excitedly inquired. Merritt drew himself up and replied:

"Her answer?" Look at me. What could be her answer?"
He was about to say something further. when one of his clients entered the office an I claimed his attention. I took advantage of the opportunity to hurry away and finish settling up my affairs.

As I thought over what my former friend had said I became convinced that it was my duty to go to Miss Barclay and warn her against him. If he had hinted that he was honestly in love with her I believe I would have all of the beautiful and the love with the little way word in his have died rather than utter one word in his disfavor. But my conscience would not per-mit me to remain silent and see her married to a man who boasted that he took her only for the fortune that he expected her to inherit. Accordingly I called upon Helen on the evening previous to my departure. Her cheeks were a little paler than usual. but she was none the less beautiful for that, and 1 felt when she greeted me that come

I had never seen her look more beautiful that she did as she sat there gazing down at the rose which lay in her lap, and thought-lessly picked the petals off, allowing them to fall, unheeded, to the floor.

I could think of no reply that would not lead to a confession of my love for her, and I therefore determined to plunge at once into the subject of Merritt's villainy.
"Miss Barclay," I managed to say, "you probably know that Mr. Merritt and I have "Yes," she returned, "he has told me that you have been almost as brothers ever since you were hoys."
"Our long acquaintance has given me many opportunities for studying his nature. Perhaps I have no right to speak to you as do, but let me assure you that my motive s an honest one. I feel that it is my duty o warn you against him. He is a fortune hunter. He has always said he would marry for money if he ever got a chance to do so, and he has informed me in so many words that he intends to take you for his wife, simply because you are the daughter buried her face in her hands and I stood there like a feel, not knowing hat to do, and soon began to wish that I the run away without hidding farewell to any one. At length, moved by a spirit of des-peration, I went geaver to her. But this, I realized, after a moment's reflection, would not, if she loved Dick Merritt, be likely to afford her much comfort, and again I found myself at a loss to know what to do. Presently it occurred to me that it would perhaps be best to leave her alone with her grief, which I did uncere-montants. moniously.

Three days later I was in Florida. Pen-ple expressed surprise at me for going there at that time of the year, when the yellow fever was carrying victims off by the hundred. But I was desperate. I was in the mood to defy all nature, and I rushed headlong into the fever district, hoping, amid the general distress, to forget the thing that was preying upon my mind and in danger of making a madman of me. I have no inclination now to recall the scenes I witnessed in the plague-stricken land. I went about among my unfertunate fellow beings insensible of the flight of time. death a white-faced nun came one morning and told me that he was down. I tried to make them let me care for him as he had cared for me, but appeals and threats were alike in vain. By sheer force they took me away, and before I half re-alized what had happened I was back home in the north. Helen Barclay received me kindly. There vere tears in her eyes when she placed her hand in mind, and vividly I realled the barsh things I had said of poor Dick.

When I dared to speak I told her all that I knew about his noble act and begged her to forget that I had ever spoken unkindly of him. For a long time she sat with downcast eyes, but locking up at last, she said:

"I am sorry you ever felt it your duly to say it of him, but I fergive you, as I know he will."

"It was all for your sake, Miss Barelay," I apologized, 'not that I wished to do Dich an injury. She was silent again for a long time, but at last she tremblingly said:
"Would you have cared if he had said he loved me for myseif alone?"

I could not reply. Every object in the room swam before my eyes, and Helen went "Oh, couldn't you see that it was all 5 ruse, that he only tried to make fealousy de for you what love would not? Dear Robert, take me," she cried, putting her arms around my neek, "It is I that ask you to
